The world's tallest mountain is in need of spring cleaning. A team of climbers flew to Mount Everest to begin cleaning up the trash left on it by other climbers. Thousands of people climb up Everest every year, leaving their trash along its trails. This includes ropes, tents and empty oxygen bottles, which climbers use to breathe more easily as they scale up the slopes.

Visitors to Nepal recently were shocked when they learned of a new rule. Climbers had to bring down everything that they took up to the mountain. If anyone was caught littering the slopes, he would be fined. The climbers agreed to the rule and understood why it was important to have it. They knew that each of them had a part to play in preserving the beauty of the mountain.
